Hong Kong Police College was established in January 2006, replacing what was previously known as Training Wing, to develop police training in a strategic manner and the College as a centre of excellence in police training.

To enhance the efficiency of the College as well as to provide a foundation that can be expanded to cope with the present and future levels of training demand, the College has been reformed and restructured on a three-school basis supplemented by two divisions in April 2015. They are the School of Foundation Training and School of Professional Development, School of Specialised Learning and two Divisions, Administration and Support Division (A&SD) and Human Resources and Finance Division (HR&FD).

The College believes that officers should take responsibility for their own learning and has therefore adopted the following Learning Trio as its overall approach to police education, which requires:

- formal training delivered by the College;
- workplace learning on the job; and
- self-study by officers in their own time.

In delivering formal training for different ranks to meet their varying training and development needs,
